Al-Tabrizi rendered this version of the original text more accessible to those not having an advanced knowledge of the science of Hadith.

Al-Baghawi classified many Hadiths as authentic to which other scholars did not agree at times. AL-Tabrizi expounded on the classifications that al-Baghawi placed on Hadiths and re-classified many of them. He also added a third section to Masabih al-Sunnah, which was already divided in two parts by al-Baghawi. This section consisted of narrations that he felt fit into the chapter and provided further clarification. Al-Baghawi did not mention the Isnad of the Hadiths, he collected whereas AL-Tabrizi mentions the source from which the Hadith can originally be found - making the text more reliable. Al-Mishkat included hadiths on beliefs, science, worship, transactions, etiquette, temptations, and virtues.

CATALOGUE NOTE

The weights as an autonomous branch of science was triggered by the eminent importance of balances for commercial purposes. In a vast empire with lively commerce between culturally and economically fairly autonomous regions, more and more sophisticated balances were, in the absence of standardization, key instruments governing the exchange of currencies and goods, such as precious metals and stones. It is therefore no surprise that Muslim scholars produced numerous treatises specifically dealing with balances and weights, explaining their theory, construction and use. This literature culminated in the compilation by 'Abd ar-Rahman al-Khazini, around 1120, of Kitab Mizan al-hikma, an encyclopedia of mechanics dedicated to the description of an ideal balance conceived as a universal tool of a science at the service of commerce, the so-called 'balance of wisdom.' This was capable of measuring absolute and specific weights of solids and liquids, calculating exchange rates of currencies, and determining time.

CATALOGUE NOTE

Both the Quran and the hadith emphasize the special role of the written word in Islam, God having used it to teach man to distinguish between good and evil. Indeed, various authorities record that the first object Allah created was the pen and the second, the inkwell. Islamic treatises and other writings describe the preparation of ink, writing tools, and other implements such as inkwells, known as mihibara or dawat (the latter also refers to an inkpot set into a pen box). Inkwells and pen boxes were held in high regard in the Seljuq world, mostly on account of the Seljuqs' notably literate elite culture and society. Inlaid brass examples inscribed with proverbs or courtly iconography were status symbols of high-ranking officers and the wealthy classes.
